The Bookworm

MISS SAMANTH MIBBS, librarian of the Jenkville Public Library, adjusted her spectacles on her thin nose and beamed at the young man across the desk. "My, such a bookworm," she said approvingly.

The young man fidgeted. "Yes'm. While I'm recuperating, I figure I ought to improve my mind so I been reading a lot."

"You certainly have," Miss Mibbs agreed, stamping the already crowded library card with the name John Dore at the top. "First you studied books on plumbing and electric wiring and house building. Now you're taking all these books on reinforced concrete construction and brick work. And, my goodness, here is one on working with tempered steel. You are ambitious."

"I told you," John Dore said nervously, "I was wounded in the war and I got to take it easy. So I came out here to Jenkville to relax and I got nothing to do but study books. Isn't it all right?"

"It certainly is," Miss Mibbs said hastily. "I didn't mean to pry, Mr. Dore. It's just that—well—some of those books have lain in our library for years with no one ever bothering to read them. I'm pleased to have someone get some use out of them now."

"Good," John Dore grunted. He accepted the armload of books and limped hastily out, almost as if fleeing from further questioning.

"He's a funny duck," Miss Curtis, the assistant librarian, said, coming up. "I don't like him."

"Nonsense," Miss Mibbs flared. "He's a very nice, studious young man. He's just shy, that's all. And I'm a snoopy old maid."

"Shy," Miss Curtis snorted. "In those clothes, he looks about as shy as a circus band wagon. Of all the loud checks and plaids and clashing colors. Why don't you get him to study a book on color harmony or clothes selection? He looks more like a—a race track tout, if you ask me."

"I'm sure," Miss Mibbs said coldly, "that if I were so familiar with race track—er—touts, I wouldn't boast of it."

Miss Curtis turned a delicate pink and went back to sorting her books. Miss Mibbs opened the morning paper and gasped. The headline shouted the stunning news: JACK OF ALL

TRADES STRIKES AGAIN! MYSTERIOUS ROBBER HITS GAS STATION SAFE FOR RICH HAUL!

Suddenly Miss Mibbs gasped again and her face turned white. Her eyes had a glazed, stricken look as she examined the astounding idea that had suddenly filtered into her mind. It was impossible—yet. . . .

Four times in the past two months the city of Jenkville had been the scene of a major robbery. Once the unknown thief had cleverly located the one spot where the electric wiring in the local bank, connecting both the alarm system and the vault mechanism, could be easily disconnected. The papers had speculated freely that the burglar was someone familiar with intricate wiring.

A week later the plumbing system of the local light company had been cleverly utilized to conduct knockout gas to the cubbyhole where the night watchman guarded the safe. Again the burglar had showed an expert's familiarity with house construction to rob a local man of his wife's jewels.

Very suddenly Miss Mibbs got to her feet. "Miss Curtis," she said in a thick, unnatural voice, "will you take charge? I shall be out for some time."

Miss Mibbs, clutching a library record card, marched straight to the Jenkville Police Station.

Chief Elmer Raber and his assistant, Billy Clebb, made the arrest shortly before noon. John Dore had made the mistake of trying to reach his gun and consequently he was not in the best shape when he was hauled in to confront the pale and trembling Miss Mibbs. He glared at her with bitter hatred out of his one unswollen eye. "I might have known you'd nose around until you got wise, you old biddy. I had a nice setup, if you'd kept your big nose out of it."

"I doubt it," Miss Mibbs said icily. "You weren't so terribly clever, you know. Jenkville is the oldest town in the state and the books you've been studying, to learn how to rob the buildings, were all published years and years ago, when the buildings were built. If you were really a wounded veteran, interested in self improvement, the government has modern, up-to-date courses in all those subjects—including manners and color harmony."
